Reports Liberty in France.

Liberty in France is interpreted with certain trifling restrictions: the right of voting freely, and in accordance with one’s conscience being excluded. Every Department, that is, every county of France, is governed by a Préfet and a Sous-Préfet: every town and village by its Mayor. The following letter from a Sous-Préfet to a village Maire explains the Government view on the subject of voting. He says, according to the Standard, “Monsieur le Maire,—The assistance accorded by the Government for the loss of cattle is not accorded as a right to all who ask for it. It is a favour which the State reserves to itself for the purpose of benefitting only persons who appear worthy of interest, and who can show with certainty that there is nothing to be desired.” Let us try to imagine the storm which such a letter from a Member of Parliament to a constituent would call forth.

Is the year 1824 Mr. Short, police constable, took unto himself a wife. This, under proper conditions, is a lawful step. He left the force, and opened a watch-making shop in Hampstead. After eight years he grew tired of his wife, being assisted towards this unhappy frame of mind by the charms of a young lady in a fancy shop next door. One day he disappeared. They presently found on the banks of the River Lea his clothes, his purse, and his watch. The conclusion was obvious. The unfortunate watchmaker must be drowned. The river was dragged, but without success: the body was never found: and the widow, one hopes, was at time reconciled to her loss. At all events, she carried on the business. But the crafty watchmaker was not drowned. He was living all the time in New Brunswick, and the clothes on the bank were simply meant to avert suspicion. This discovery has caused a little employment for solicitors and barristers, and a job for Mr. Justice Butt. However, the lady is now as good as a widow, and I hope, is satisfied.

Is the City of Philadelphia 5,034 persons are said to be engaged in the rum traffic. I suppose the paper from which this statement is copied includes whiskey and other ardent drinks. Of these persons 5,041 are Irish, 2,179 Germans, 265 negroes, 2,344 belong to other nationalities, and 205 are Americans. Of the number 3,666 are women, of whom one only is of American birth. The writer goes on to remark that there would not be many drinking saloons if Americans had to keep them.

These figures are suggestive. It is clear that the keeping of saloons, that is to say, of public houses, is considered disgraceful, otherwise, men of American origin would not hold aloof from the trade, but they do not try to monopolize the public houses. They run restaurants after the foreign style: they become waiters: they are tailors, cabinet makers, and bakers, but they leave the Briton in undisturbed possession of his bar. The sight of a German or a Frenchman behind the bar of the “Spotted Dog” would cause a revolution.

Should the prisoner in the following case be acquitted?

It is a delicate point, and I would rather not pronounce an opinion. I believe however, that it is acknowledged that
